

Race to the top

Karl Quinn asks if white people should really be worried about Critical Race Theory – and what it is.

Zero gravity

Shane Wright looks at the latest manoeuvres of the Reserve Bank as it tries to keep our economy afloat.

STATE OF CHAOS

Even if the election ends Trump's administration, his hold on US politics guarantees more storms ahead, Matthew Knott reports.

It was a Trump rally like no other. Midnight was approaching and two sleeps remained until election day. Thousands of people were gathered at an airport hangar in Miami's northern suburbs. COVID-19 cases were rising again in Florida and the mayor of Miami-Dade County had instituted a midnight curfew to stop people from congregating together. Nobody paid any attention: the President was coming to town and they wanted to see him in the flesh. The vast majority of the crowd were Hispanic: first- or second-generation immigrants from countries such as Cuba, Venezuela and Nicaragua. All ages were represented: parents had brought young children along and there were plenty of excited teens in red "Make America Great Again" hats. When Trump descended from Air Force One, the crowd launched into chants of "Viva Trump" and "We love you". "And I love you too," Trump responded. "We're all in this together, we're all in this together."

Continued Page 44